The primary cause was what may be termed a natural one the result of the progress of the age and a higher degree of civilization—namely, the substitution of steam in the place of winds as an agent for ship propulsion and the substitution of iron in the place of wood as a material for ship construction and for nations or individuals to have attempted to permanently counteract the influence of these substitutions by legislation or any specific commocial policy was as useless, as our own experience proves, as the how sought to arrest the stars in their courses.
